High-tech change has reshaped profession marketplaces for periods. But the advantages have not always been widely shared. As AI and digital technologies change today's workplace even those at the forefront of innovation are not immune to disruption as recent job cuts at major technology companies show.

However new responsibilities are also emerging, as others disappear. New competences, new responsibilities, and entirely new occupations are being created alongside automation, offering alternative pathways for prosperity.

Professional, methodological, and managerial roles are seeing the most demand for new proficiencies, particularly in IT, which accounts for more than half of this demand. Area -specific capabilities are also trending. Healthcare, for instance, is seeing an outpouring in telecare and digital health skills, while marketing increasingly demands expertise in social media.

Artificial intelligence, remote work, technology, millennials, Covid 19 and globalism are among the many things effecting today's workplace that were not concerns in previous generations. In this webinar we will explore how these and other issues continue to change the modern workplace and what new things are on the horizon.

Speaker: Professor Stephen C. Betts, Ph.D, William Paterson University
